

This knitwear collection explores the formation of identity through adolescence, secrecy, and desire. It explores the tension between the public performances demanded by ideology and the private passions that remain hidden, with the body carrying the weight of love, fear, and unspoken self-discovery.

Inspired by the novel Red Azalea, a memoir of youth under the Cultural Revolution.

This is a Spring/Summer knitwear collection that explores the formation of identity through adolescence, secrecy, and desire. It is inspired by the novel Red Azalea, a memoir in which youth unfolds under the tension between the public performances demanded by ideology and the private passions that remain hidden. This conflict becomes a defining emotional force. The body carries the weight of love, fear, and unspoken self-discovery.

This duality is translated into soft, body focused knitwear that shifts between concealment and exposure. Silhouettes are close and fluid, using layering and transparency to suggest what cannot be openly expressed, holding intimacy just beneath the surface.

The collection will explore techniques including tubular knitting, dubbed knitting, embossing, felting, and heat press printing, using each process to translate how identity is not performed outwardly but carried inwardly. It is held in the body and revealed only through texture, touch, and subtle transformation.

Customer: Innocent Allure

The target customer is a young woman aged 18–30 who expresses her identity through a balance of softness and quiet intensity. She is drawn to tactile, artisanal pieces and fluid silhouettes, using layering and transparency to create looks that feel intimate, expressive, and slightly unconventional. Her style is a blend of whimsy with subtle provocation and reflects a nuanced femininity. It is soft, introspective, and quietly seductive.

She is drawn to independent designers and artisanal labels, often seeking out smaller knitwear brands such as Pillings for their crafted, personal feel. Her taste is influenced by cultural icons like Faye Wong, who shape her quiet appreciation for individuality and creative expression rather than mass appeal.
